As far as sound, there is Dolby TrueHD 7.1 and 2.0, both remastered from the original 5.1 mix. Extras include an introduction by director Jeremy Lovering, deleted scenes, bloopers, 3 featurettes, and an EPK with commentary by Tyler Perry and Uzo Aduba. On the downside, the print is in its worst condition of the three films. The print has heavy water damage throughout and a few spots of edge wear. The Blu-ray has some light hairline scratches, but no issues with the print. There is no English subtitles. Now for the good news: although the print is in its worst condition of the three films, the technical specs aren't that bad. There is only moderate to heavy light dust in the form of specks on the discs. There is some edge wear, but not a ton. The print is in its best condition. Tyler Perry's House Next Door: Meet the Blacks (2013) Blu-ray, Lionsgate: The Blu-ray is bare bones on the technical specs. It comes packaged with a slipcover. There is no new 1080p 2.39:1 AVC encode. Instead, it's the same 1080p 2.39:1 AVC encode as the DVD, so there is no new AVC encode here. The transfer is the same one as the DVD and Blu-ray, so you get the same 1080p 2.39:1 AVC encode from the same transfer. The sound is also the same Dolby TrueHD 7.1 and 2.0 surround mix as the DVD and Blu-ray. Tyler Perry's House Next Door: Meet the Blacks (2013) Blu-ray and DVD are presented in a standard clear case with slipcover. The cover artwork is just plain black, but does look like the packaging for the DVD and Blu-ray. The back cover artwork has "2010" and the title printed on it. It is just black text and has a mock leather finish to it. The inside of the case has a generic cardboard slipcover with the title and case art printed on it. It's nice, but you would expect more from Lionsgate. A reversible sleeve is used for the slipcover. It has a black fabric exterior and a black fabric interior. There is a generic disc art piece for the disc label and the back cover. The other side of the disc label is very generic and has no artwork on 82157476af
